

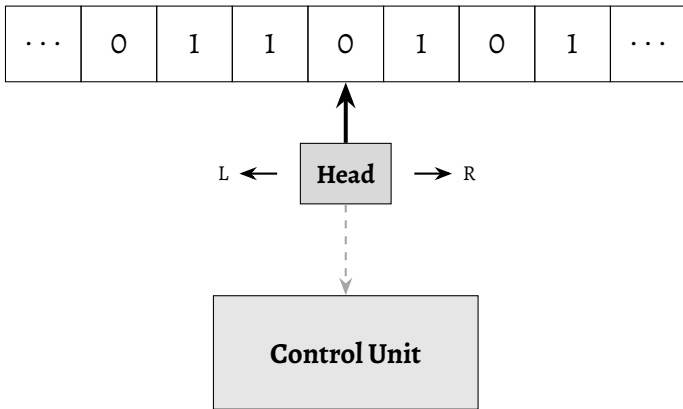

Figure 16 – Schematic representation of a Turing machine. The model consists of a potentially unbounded tape divided into cells, each containing a symbol. The head reads and writes symbols on the tape, and can move to the left (L) or right (R). The control unit determines the action to be performed based on the current state and the symbol read, defining the next state, the symbol to be written, and the direction of the move.

